In symmetric multiprocessing, each processor can interact with other processor, but in asymmetric multiprocessing each processor has its own task and does not interact with other processor.

Advantages:

1. We have more throughput, which means tasks will be processed faster and we also have better response time.
2. If one process cannot do its task, the system will not fail and continue to do its work.
3. Economy of scale, they can share peripherals, mass storage and power supplies.

Disadvantages:

1. The synchronization between processor require programmer to write their program in this type which is difficult.

1.16

In clustered system we have several system that interconnect with each other and each node can be itself a multiprocessor system, but multiprocessor system is just one system. The system must monitor each other and if one node is failed, other node that monitor it, restart this node and continues its work. User just see a brief interruption of the service.

1.17

One way is asymmetric clustering in which one system is hot-standby and monitor other system and when one system is failed, it starts to continue its work. Advantage is that implementation of this model is easy, but disadvantage is that because hot-standby system does not always uses of its resources, its performance is not suitable. In symmetric model every node is running application and monitor other nodes. Disadvantage is that implementation of his model is harder but advantage is that its performance is higher.

In network computer users can share data and hardware with each other and we have more power computational capability in compare with traditional PCs. One thing that we must consider in network computers is the simultaneously access to data but in traditional PCs we did not have this problem. In network computers resource utilization must be considered but in PCs we do not have to consider resource utilization.
